LEARNING & WORK

Learn with AI. Then check what you can do without it.

A coding experiment separates completing a task from learning its method. Your training programme should measure both.

If AI helps a colleague finish an unfamiliar task, you have evidence that the assisted workflow produced an output. You still need to establish what the colleague learnt. That distinction matters when the person will later have to spot a mistake, explain a recommendation or work through an exception.

Opening a source is the beginning of verification. Check whether its population, measure and conclusion match the sentence you want to publish.

A working link can lead to a reputable paper that answers a different question. Check the claim against the methods and results before borrowing the paper's authority.

IMAGES & TRUST

An image's credentials describe its history, not the whole truth

A photograph can be unaltered and presented with a misleading caption. Provenance helps trace the file; reporting must still establish what it shows.

AGENTS & CONTROL

Limit an AI agent's permissions before improving its prompt

A mailbox summary needs access to messages, not authority to send them. Start with the actions a task requires and enforce those limits in the connected system.
